

PARATEXT #3: JOE'S EMAIL EXCHANGES WITH JONATHAN AND JANE

Okay! Sounds good to me!

Take care!

Jonathan

On Wed, Feb 17, 2010 at 9:14 AM, Joseph Janangelo <JJANANG@luc.edu> wrote:

Hi,

I'm so excited for you - published author! I'm working on my draft & will hope to send you something in March.

Congratulations, again!

Best,

Joe

>>> Jonathan Pearson 2/16/2010 9:14 PM >>>

> Hey Joe!

> How's everything in Chicago? I was wondering how the project was coming > along? I got the emails from you and Shannon. Was there anything you needed from me? I'm just making sure we're all on target. Anyway, the Young Scholars Journal arrived in the mail today, and it was truly a delight to see my first academic article in print!

> Hope you're doing well!

> Jonathan

On Mon, Dec 21, 2009 at 5:02 PM, Joseph Janangelo <JJANANG@luc.edu> wrote:

>> Hi Jane,

>> I hope you are doing well.

>> I'm writing (with Jonathan's permission) with a very rough draft of my interview with Jonathan regarding his fine article. Now we'd like to read your version of "the story." :-) Can you please write back to me - in boldface in the text -- or in a separate letter at the end of it to share your recollections and observations?

We welcome all your input, but I'd love to know:

1. How and where did you sense publication potential in the original essay that it should be shared with others?
2. How did you try to intervene and mentor the author?
3. What else would you like to say? Perhaps here you might discuss the journal's mission and your roles...
4. Can you generalize from this situation to give advice to undergraduate authors writing publish and to those who seek to mentor them?
5. Did you two discuss "audience" at all? If so how?
6. What did you learn from working with this author?
7. What are the biggest developments you see in the essay?
8. Raise your own great ideas!

I'll be in tomorrow if you want to chat - just let me know. 312-915-6571. Thank you and Jonathan for your help. This is enlightening and fun!

Best,

Joe