"Mapping New York Literary History Project [line break] Welcome to Mapping New York's Literary History, a digital literary history project produced by Lehman College English majors in concert with English professor Bret Maney. To begin exploring our interactive project, open this post. [line break] Read More ["Read More" is a hyperlink.]"

The second column from the left contains a photo of an apartment building. The text reads:

"Entwined Legacies: Piri Thomas and Spanish Harlem." [line break] By D. R. | Spanish Harlem has been home to countless authors, artists, musicians and actors. It encompasses 96th street up to about 140th street from Pleasant Avenue to Fifth Avenue. It is the prototypical urban environment with high crime and constant police sirens. However, there is a charm and if you grow up here [...] [line break] Read More ["Read More" is a hyperlink.]"

The third column from the left contains a photo of a World Trade Center Memorial Fountain. The text reads:

"'Reflecting Absence': The World Trade Center Memorial Fountains" [line break] By Najee Johnson | The twin reflecting pools are located at the World Trade Center and are surrounded by five buildings. As a representation of the twin towers' absence, the memorial fountains are placed at the former footprints of the North and South towers. The pools give New Yorkers, tourists, family, and friends an opportunity [...] [line break] Read More ["Read More" is a hyperlink.]"

The far-right column contains a search bar and an "About" blurb that reads:

"This site showcases innovative writing about the cultures and literatures of the Americas. It was developed by Bret Maney, assistant professor of English at Lehman College, CUNY, and is written by student-critics in the English Department at Lehman College."
